A mysterious alien force, seeking earth for unknown reasons, is invading the human psyche and taking control of our bodies. The existence of the invasion has been known for a hundred years. Scientists and philosophers have discussed it and given it names. Theories have been built based on these names and on these theories. On the internet, different theories abound. The game is about a fictional agent, Dr. Quantum, who is investigating a large conspiracy – a network of scientists and philosophers involved in this conspiracy. He tries to find the missing piece to the puzzle, but all the pieces are missing. The game is about Dr. Quantum. The events take place in real-time, we are in the middle of events that we can affect. The events play out in the browser as a video game. The moments we experience in real-time are the moments you'll be playing. You'll be solving the cases as you play them. You'll be experiencing the puzzles as you're solving them. The choice is yours. Copyright 2017 Marin S. Past, David L. Richards. The Temporal Invasion is an entertaining game that has me thinking about things I have never considered. I was pleasantly surprised at the end of this game when I found out that not only did I have to play to the end of the game to learn the ending, but that I had to finish the game to unlock a new ending! The Temporal Invasion is not something that I would necessarily recommend to someone else, as it is a game you have to be willing to explore on your own. However, I enjoyed that I was left thinking, and my wife is glad that she played it too. The Temporal Invasion is an interesting, thought-provoking, and enjoyable experience. It is a game that I would recommend to a friend. Pros: - Interesting story- You are able to see what happens in the past by taking actions in the

: International Relations Defining International Relations from the perspective of the Coeuréanas Principle. Bonnier F (2019) "The Temporal Invasion: International Relations" Political Theory?, 43(4), pp.500-519 Modern International Relations is constantly evolving, shifting, and transforming. While many studies focus on specific theories, empirical findings, and state's institutions in order to trace the evolution of the discipline, few study global trends that dominate the discipline today. In this paper I draw attention to global trends that constitute the field of international relations by providing the first systematic study of the evolution of this field from the perspectives of power, identity and human agency, by tracing their increasing interaction with the social sciences. The paper starts by outlining a summary of the theoretical trajectory from Max Weber to the present. It then proceeds to explore the historical origins of each of these trends and how they interacted to constitute today's IR, beginning with power. We then continue to move forward towards the modern period, where the first explicitly transformed IR was formed, consisting in interculturalism and world politics, as well as the first theory of international society, world society. The contentions and argumentations of the paper are put forward by expanding upon the historical origins of each idea sketched by Foucault. I mainly focus on the form these ideas took in the European context, but also emphasise the interaction between the concept of identity and those of power and human agency, as they are currently prevalent in the discipline. The purpose of the paper is to stress the importance of considering the field of international relations within a continuum that would run from the 'invisible hand' of the economic sphere through the 'biological' sphere of historical events to the human agency that we see around us. These ideas will in turn help design a set of timeless principles for the discipline that remain applicable to today's IR. Bonnier defends the thesis that the field of IR, especially since its great characterisation by Keynes in the 1940s, has been the outcome of twofold process: a systemic one, consisting in the development of the politics that includes and is based upon economic processes, as well as the social and cultural development within that system that also contributes to its further development. These processes and their interplay lead to the evolution of the field of IR. The Fin de Siècle "L'émergence d�
